BEST PRACTICE FROM FATONI UNIVERSITY: MINORITY AGENCY IN ADVANCING THE MUSLIM COMMUNITY IN SOUTHERN THAILAND

A visit to Fatoni University in Pattani, Thailand, offers critical insights into the role of minority institutions in community development. Located in a region where Muslims are a minority within the Kingdom of Thailand, Fatoni University demonstrates how limited demographic and political positioning does not preclude substantial contributions to educational and social advancement.

Rather than articulating grievances regarding structural constraints, the university's stakeholders engage in proactive institution-building. This includes the development of academic laboratories, the publication of scholarly journals, the implementation of campus-based da'wah initiatives, and community empowerment programs focused on education and economic resilience. The institution's nomenclature, derived from the historical Pattani Sultanate — once a prominent center of Islamic learning in Southeast Asia — reflects an intentional effort to revive and operationalize that intellectual legacy through contemporary academic practice.

A central tenet observed among faculty and students is the principle of self-responsibility: "If not us, then who will advance the Muslim community here?" Operating with limited financial resources and within a complex sociopolitical context, the university has cultivated adaptive strategies. Examples include student-led cooperatives, Arabic language centers, and provision of free basic health services to surrounding communities. These initiatives illustrate how constraint can function as a catalyst for innovation.

This observation invites comparative reflection on the Indonesian context. As a Muslim-majority nation, Indonesia possesses extensive religious infrastructure: widespread mosques, pesantren, Islamic universities, and significant religious endowments. Despite these advantages, the scale of impact on the broader ummah appears disproportionate to available resources.

The disparity suggests that majority status may inadvertently foster complacency. Security in numbers can reduce the perceived urgency for collective action, leading to fragmentation and inward focus. In contrast, Fatoni University exemplifies that numerical strength is not a prerequisite for agency. Impact is determined by mobilization, vision, and sustained effort.

In conclusion, the case of Fatoni University provides empirical evidence that meaningful advancement of a community is possible under conditions of minority status. For majority contexts such as Indonesia, the imperative is to translate structural advantages into measurable outcomes. The experience in Pattani underscores a fundamental proposition: where there is will, pathways for advancing the ummah can be constructed irrespective of demographic politics. Man jadda wa jadda

REMAINING MESSAGE OF THE PRESIDENT

Thailand. This time the participation was truly overwhelmingly enormous. 32 organizations from 28 countries participated in these four days moot comprising of council meeting, networking sessions and scientific conventions. The participants not only updated about their own performance but also took keen interest in the affairs and activities of other IMAs. Projects reports highlighted their yearly concert and future planning. The scientific session was certainly eloquent and envisioned for the purpose. This year theme of the scientific session focused on environmental issues currently being faced globally. Very treasured and idiosyncratic discussion were also generated in the Consortium of Islamic Medical Colleges (CIMCO) and the Islamic Hospital Consortium (IHC). The visits to local healthcare authorities and institutions remained very productive, providing opportunities for collaborations at academic, clinical and multi centric research projects. Almost all participants visited Fatoni University at Patani, a state-of-the-art seat of tertiary level learning and training. An elegant campus and highly skilled faculty of these great institutions, not only serve the people of Thailand but several students and scholars from other countries are also being educated and trained in this University. The university is being managed and governed by a charitable Islamic Trust providing free of cost education and training at very affordable resources.

FIMA Council elaborated on various issues

currently faced by the global healthcare fraternity at large and reviewed FIMA projects. FIMA Council applauded the progress made by its constituent units and approved the associate membership of three IMAs. Next FIMASAC camp will be held in July 2027 at Turkey and Umra camp in November 2026. The e next FIMA council meeting will hold in Istanbul, while dates will be soon announced by the host. We determinedly believe that together we can bring tangible improvement in health care delivery system of our people and our efforts will be accepted by Almighty Allah. FIMA marks the month of September for Life saver training at gross root level, through its constituent IMAs and I strong vouch that this world-wide exercise will be beneficial for humanity at large: “...but as for that which benefits the people, it remains on the earth. Thus does Allah present examples.” (Quran 13:17). Our beloved prophet PBUH said: “The best of people are those who are beneficial to other people.” (Al Mu'jamul Awsat, Hadith: 5783, Shu'abul Iman, Hadith: 7252). We must all sincerely strive to ease the lives of those who are in distress and particularly who are not being looked after otherwise.
