examine and critically analyze the local issues and their amicable solution by collaborating with other authorities. One of the rapidly emerging challenges of the current age is climate changes exacerbating health crises. Climate changes lead to humanitarian emergencies from heat waves, wildfires, floods, tropical storms and hurricanes and they are increasing in scale, frequency and intensity. Research shows that 3.6 billion people already live in areas highly susceptible to climate change. Between 2030 and 2050, climate change is expected to cause approximately 250 000 additional deaths per year, from under nutrition, malaria, diarrhea and heat stress alone. The direct damage costs to health (excluding costs in health-determining sectors such as agriculture and water and sanitation) is estimated to be between US$ 2–4 billion per year by 2030. Most of the developing countries have weak health infrastructure will be the least able to cope without assistance to prepare and respond. We need to act urgently with proven and scalable solutions; Reducing emissions of greenhouse gases through better transport, food and energy use choices can result in very large gains for health, particularly through reduced air pollution.

It seems many countries still undermine the effects of climate vicissitudes on human health and consequently not sensitized the needs for preparation to mitigate the effects of such changes. World Health organization has proposed several actions requiring to protect the humans from the harsh effects of climate changes on human including:

Measures to reduce carbon emissions and improve health: supporting a rapid and equitable transition to a clean energy economy; ensuring that health is central to climate change mitigation policy. It will ultimately help to mobilize resources for better management of this crisis. All IMAs should promote better, more climate-resilient and environmentally sustainable health systems: ensuring core services, environmental sustainability and climate resilience as central components of Universal health Coverage (UHC) and primary health care (PHC); supporting health systems to leapfrog to cheaper, more reliable and cleaner solutions, while decarbonizing high-emitting health systems; and mainstreaming climate resilience and environmental sustainability into health service investments, including the capacity of the health workforce.

Strive to protect health from the wide range of impacts of climate change: assessing health vulnerabilities and developing health plans; integrating climate risk and implementing climate-informed surveillance and response systems for key risks, such as extreme heat and infectious disease, safe water and food provision to the masses.

Prepare futuristic leadership and Raise Awareness: Climate related health implications, aiming to centralize health in climate policies, including through the UNFCCC. This can be achieved through collaboration with major health agencies, health professionals and civil society.

Collect evidence and continuous monitoring: WHO, with its network of global experts, contributes global evidence summaries, provides assistance to nations in their assessments, and monitors progress. IMAs should play leading role in combating with these issues. We need to collaborate among IMAs and use the strengths of one IMA to fill the gaps in others systems, thus building the capacity of personals and support the country. Many times we also need to focus on collaboration across sectors, updated guidance, hands-on training, and support for project preparation and execution as well as for securing climate and health funding. This could be achieved by bringing together a range of health and development partners, to support IMAs and countries in achieving their commitments to climate-resilient and low carbon health systems.

In forth coming annual meetings of IMAs as well the FIMA council and scientific meeting, major emphasis should be on climate changes and how individual IMA as well collectively we can mobilize resources to meet such challenges. We expect next FIMA council meeting and scientific session will be instrumental in finding evidence based solutions of our existing and impending issues particularly related to the effects of climate changes on human health and wellbeing.
